ABOUT THE PEONY

BY GROOT&GROOT

A peony is a perennial, that means it can stay in the soil for many years without digging it out. After planting the peony it will take 2 year before there is enough production to start harvesting flowers. By taking care of the plants and doing the right things the third year will be more productive. This productivity can be stable for many years when the plant is in a healthy condition.

Types of peonies

We offer 3 different types of peonies:

- Hybrid: In general early and mid-productive varieties
Lactiflora: Late varieties with mid to high production
Itoh: A common peony for using in pots and gardens

Uses

A peony can be used for different things. Mainly the peony is used for the production of cut flowers. The main production country of peony flowers is The Netherlands. Besides this also France, Italy and United States are big producers of flowers. On the southern hemisphere New Zealand and Chile are upcoming producers for late season.

The 'Itoh' type is a commonly used peony for the garden usage. Because of the enormous strength of the plant, this peony will produce many flowers and leaves from the first year on. As last there is a special assortment for pot peonies. Using short, easy flowering and strong varieties will give the best results.

Climates

The climate can have an enormous influence on the growth of peonies. The best possible conditions are a strong and cold wintertime, with mild temperatures in spring and a middle warm summer. Peony varieties can give a total different reaction in various climate zones. By having good advice about which varieties are suitable for which climate, you as a producer can get much better results.

Diseases

The main problem in the growth of peonies is the leaf nematode. The first step to prevent this is buying good nematode-free planting material in order to have the best start. By mowing the crop early in the season in combination with dry conditions and removing the crop residues you can prevent propagation and spreading of nematodes in your crop.

Also botrytis control is an important point of attention. By doing the right treatments in springtime and during the summer season, botrytis can be held under control. Besides all of this it's important to keep peonies free of weed, which can be an important source of diseases.
